The batter must generally "put the ball into play" by hitting it, generally in a limited area of the game field, before being able to run around the various safe havens. [9] In many situations, runners (including batters) are "forced" to advance to the next safe haven, with runners who are put out when an opponent with the ball touches the base they are to reach. The runner may choose to take a safe refuge other than the one provided by the laws of the game. If the runner chooses to take a safe refuge other than the one provided by the laws of the game, the runner is safe from the sampling team, and able to score their tracks. Leaving a safe refuge puts the runner in danger of being put out (eliminated). Teams pass the roles when the field team puts enough of the players of the batting team out, which varies from game to game. In modern baseball, the players put out three players. [11] In cricket, they "allow" all players but one, [12] although in some forms of cricket, there is also a limit on the number of legal deliveries that the sampling team needs to perform, so that they can become the batting team without getting anyone out. [13] In many forms of American baseball (city, round ball), a single finished inning. Some games allow multiple runners and some have more bases to perform in sequence. Batting can occur, and the race begins (and potentially fine), in one of the bases. The movement between those "safe hosts" is regulated by the rules of particular sport. The game ends when the losing team completed a number of innings (fighting turns). [14][15] Some variations of bat-and-ball games do not have bats, with the batter instead using their body to hit the ball. Other variations give the ball possession at the beginning of each game, eliminating the role of the defensive team in the start of the action.
