Often, one of the most common things heard at school, at work and in the conference room is that there is no stupid question and that the only questions considered stupid or stupid have ever been asked. However, this is not entirely true because there are so many people out there asking hermetically stupid or stupid questions, regardless of race or color. Some stupid people say stupid things, and yes, there's something like a stupid question. But the irony of this is that no one must be both the judge and the jury in situations where these questions are posed because what may seem stupid to a person could be even more fascinating to the other. Of course, someone will feel that question and inevitably will have to react to it. While some may decide whether it is engaging or interesting or not, others would also make the stupid or not called. Whatever the case, if you are the person who receives the question, it also has in mind that the essence of asking questions is learning from it and not necessarily to seem stupid at the end, however, also note that apparently stupid questions could be deliberately asked by someone only for the purpose of testing your assumption on the topic of discussion. There are a couple of reasons why people ask stupid or mute questions, which includes gaining knowledge, as well as helping you understand things you never did and remove wrong assumptions, and sometimes just to look funny and make people laugh. More so, to ask stupid questions sometimes so that everyone is on the same page. Stupid questions can also help you learn and discover the complexity of things that initially seem to be obvious. Imagine you're in a meeting to discuss your company's digital transition plan, and there are arguments of pros and cons of entering the digital world, and suddenly, one of your colleagues asked the question, it's why we're going digital anyway. To some people, the question may sound stupid or stupid because in our world today every company needs to pass digital. However, responding to this question would help you to discover and align your goals, the company aims to reach within making its digital operations. That said, asking stupid questions can also help you acquire new knowledge. When asked stupid stupidYou may sound stupid at first, but you'll learn something new in the end. Similarly, if you avoid asking the question, others may not realize your ignorance, but you will continue to be ignorant. Here are some smart ways to ask questions without sounding stupid or stupid: First: It doesn't make sense to ask a question if it's something you can learn by observing, especially when it's about things you do every day that everyone should know. Even though some things are complex, try to learn as much as possible by yourself before asking others. Start with What You Know: Asking questions about things you have no idea about will make you even look dumber. So, if you don't want to sound stupid, you need to do some research on the subject before you ask any questions. Also, when you ask questions, start by mentioning what you know about the topic and then look for clarification on things you don't understand. Follow Google's rule: It would be absurd to ask questions about things you can find the answer on Google. So, discreetly Google the term to understand what they're talking about, and if you don't have that opportunity, memorize them and check when you are. The bottom line is: "Google your friend." Think before you speak: As you already know, "Some questions aren't stupid, but the way you ask them without thinking about them makes you stupid." "Don't ask a question when it comes to your mind, but try to think about it and see if it's worth asking or not. Don't admit your stupidity: One of the biggest mistakes you can make when asking a question is to acknowledge that it's stupid questions, which would make them look even stupider. Stop saying, "I know it's a stupid question, but don't apologize for asking the question either, because it might prepare you for a contemptuous answer. When you ask a stupid question, make sure you ask it with confidence. Ask for feedback from subject matter experts: Being in a meeting where someone raises a point you don't understand could be so daunting, especially when others seem to understand it very well. Rather than admit that you don't understand and show your ignorance, seek further clarification from people who have a thorough knowledge of the subject. Seek clarification through details: Often, the reason you ask a stupid question is that you don't clearly understand something. So when someone explains something to you, but you don't understand clearly, they don't admit they don't understand. Instead, ask for details that clarify their explanation without showing you don't understand. How do you respond when someone asks a stupid question? Listening to stupid questions can be really frustrating, and if someone asks a stupid or stupid question, they're not going to feel good when others make a joke or when they are ridiculed. However, it is possible to put them back on the right path, but avoid saying something that could be seen as sarcasm. They may feel embarrassed to find that they have lost something so simple, so it is pertinent not to make them feel worse. As the proverb says, "do a stupid question, get a stupid answer." But it's not always like that. If that's something you can answer to, just give the answer and move on, and if that's not true, declare it and move on, unless you want to discuss it. Besides, with friends, you can always laugh and joke, but in the serious meetings will not be the case. At a serious meeting, conference or interview, it is advisable to ask you to reformulate/process the question or ask you to discuss the matter at a later time. Don't try to embarrass the person who asked the stupid question and show your intelligence.
